

The chapter begins with understanding "what is known to us", from an individual perspective where viewers of philosophical liberals and modern conservatives narrow down to the subjective eudaimonia.

The author argues, that the Nicomachean Ethics is what we can identify and flourish, which also include the state of the individual and its relations. It is not an isolation of moral development but the development within individuals on which areas they pursue. And she continues "we cannot look at the isolated individual but must instead observe the individual-in-context."

* That sounds like a pre-apprehension of social psychology in political sense. I can relate that, personally from my orientation and background added to my community experience. How I can couple with other experiences that I can also state my experience within.

*What do you mean?

*Well if I see a group of people who I like to have a group discussion and if me and other person is alone but we both know the group nearby is like us. I'll be motivated to initiate a talk with the other single person sitting aside. Isn't that the nourishing experience for an individual who observes the plurality and applies a flourishing experience to start with?

*Ohh... yeah... I get the motivation.

- We have a good start here, so I feel also motivated to quote from the author "The context of the individual includes the home, family, community, and nation that they are born into, the physical environment that they exist in and the structural conditions that link them to socially intelligible categories and political history, therefore organizing the consequences of their being in the world."
- The important artifact, the structural conditions, let's say you are indeed sitting alone and you know there are people sitting together and there is another person sitting alone like you. Could the structural conditioning that link you take a chance (time) to initiate a conversation which you think that could be the right time? /

- Okay, let me try to explain
What could be your initiative to talk to the other person in the room as best described in your code of social conduct.
- Well, maybe, I like the t-shirt of that person, but it would be awkward if I imminently say something, the structure doesn't look like an imminent response I should give. But, maybe he is wearing a sweater on it, that move looks like drawing attention to initiate a good compliment 😊
- So you are saying, the socially intelligible states also be a structural condition,
- Maybe, yes.

So, let's dive into what flourishing means: We may want to find a common ground to get a better sense of what flourishing might be, for that, let's consider, Adam Smith's and the present general view of leftists - that is "no society can surely be flourishing and happy, of which the far greater part of the members are poor and miserable. It is but equity, besides, that they who feed, clothe, and lodge the whole body of the people, should have such a share of the produce of their own labor as to be themselves tolerably well fed, clothed, and lodged" (A. Smith 1977, B1, chap8) What is tolerable should not be extreme to a point of misery.

The majority of the world population are in more than of a miserable conditions to be counted as tolerable and we alone cannot justify this without working towards educating ourselves to have a broader perspective and practice for policies to implement forward prosperity for structural reality we want to achieve not for our own household but for many lives we share our times.

Therefore, our understanding our political economy should share and be to foster the economical components and values.

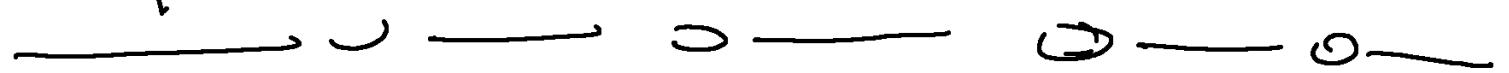

This will be more doable if we can understand the nature and the function of economy.

And with regards to our collective positive experience, our day to day social functioning, and positive psychology that enables flourishing; we are more tend to democratize our lives and times state our experience together.

Flourishing, is not just a individual level, nor it is solely about cumulation of social functions in an economical context, is a state where the individual-in-context have structural characteristics that democratizes subjective and also the individual refinement.

To my understanding, subjective experience can be different than individual understanding, while we can share thoughts, emotions that are embodied in individuals with a similar experience, subjective experience also more granular than how individuals refine understanding of their experience. It is "individual-in-context"

The author, Deva Woodly denotes - that^v
This means that we must think of flourishing as a proportion rather than a mean (Seche 2019, happier than them, but more of them are happy), and that a polity's flourishing can only be observed by taking into account what proportion of individuals are flourishing and attending to whether and what demographic and structural characteristics accord with flourishing and why."

In a political framework, on the contrary, the doctrines, such as American Dream or Western liberal capitalism progress in a way to bamboozle any member of the societal structure
We often think that our misery is a result of our choices or actions. We are becoming to think that our conditioned, social living states poor stays poor, and our predetermined conditions remains intact and therefore we continue to struggle.

This results in desperation we all manifest.

• Can you give an example?

• A mother would think for her kids won't be able to change their lifestyle as they wish. It could be so apparent to her that, their lifestyle is constraint by their structural conditions. Her kids may be educated more than her but since they experience generational poverty, they can achieve wealth and function just a little better than they have started. So, let say she is a cooker at a school, her kids can only achieve becoming teacher not an investor or tech manager at a highly successful company. This thinking causes both individual and community-destroying behaviors.

This is not just an individual-level despair but a political one.

It arises from a sense of powerlessness, stemming from the belief that social conditions that situate a person is unsolvable. The stagnant beliefs in political progress are a result of such human desperation, in which the human factors applies those belief in both political execution and the authorities they govern.

These barriers seem omnipresent yet tangible – limiting both personal growth – thru oppression – and self-determination – thru domination =

And the result is the revolving beliefs of fallacy in solutions proposed.

The desperation often leads to endorsing what or who is favorable to us.

— Can you explain what do you mean by "Revolving beliefs of fallacy in solution proposed"

— Yes, I can.

⊗ Let's say that you want to present a playful exercise to your students, that is even more entertaining than their standard curriculum activities.

Let say their standard daily classroom activities they engage in is in fact includes very useful exercises that are also giving them a sense of gameplay.

But what you wanna do to reinforce this sense by including their subjective therefore sensual experience for better comprehension.

- What if the students understand that this exercise is fun to do but they don't want to initiate the active involvement

— why is that

⊗ Because of the revolving beliefs of fallacy in solution proposed

* They might think that this is boring or criticize the activity before even begin

* They might be 'on guard' among other kids if they want to act cool, they might turn up their nose at the idea of enjoying it if they are the only one giving it a try.

— Are you saying this is a habitual response?

— Yes, but I felt like "revolving beliefs" is more poetic saying.

And to my statement, the fallacy in the solution proposed is a horse blinkers view of a neoliberalization surge.

The author puts it simply;

“The form of capitalism that is now dominant — variously called neoliberal capitalism, corporatism, or clone capitalism — takes the logic of hyper efficient, profit maximizing rational person (either individual or corporate) as the relevant agent of all aspects of life and has spawned ways of reasoning that devalue all aspects of human life that cannot be properly categorized by price or efficiency.”
